ABSTRACT

Software running on a desktop device determines whether or not binaries (executables) need to be pushed to a remote device. If binaries need to be pushed to the remote device, the desktop determines which particular binaries need to be pushed to the remote device, and pushes the needed binaries to the remote device. Once all needed binaries are loaded onto the remote device, functions on the remote device can be executed via remote procedure calls.